Who wants more fast Internet with all this Netflix stuff? First, of course, you don't want to create a superfast Internet service where Internet rates don't reflect your actual usage. The Federal Communications Commission said in 2000 just the opposite—that "the most important factors of congestion and service quality are the price and the capacity of available capacity." That's why it is so crucial to ensure there's sufficient data services available for everyone to watch and download content with reasonable speeds.. FCC Commissioner Mark Wheeler issued an impassioned plea this summer for Internet providers to stop discriminating on the basis of whether they offer broadband service to people in the United States, saying there's enough demand for "open and fair Internet" in the region to justify expansion of service. "The time to act has come," he said. "The time for fear has almost come." But at least one telecommunications company has been expanding faster data plans than they were in early 2011: Netflix was recently acquired by Amazon for a price tag of $16 billion.. In fact, the Wall Street Journal reported on Monday that Comcast is preparing to roll out 500,000 more Internet-only customers across its vast Internet service territory. The Journal cited a person familiar with the plans as "confirming" this number during a telephone interview. Comcast previously said it could have as many as 20 million customers by the end of the year in the U.S. It does not disclose subscriber numbers. "We're ramping up very quickly," David Pogue, executive vice president of Comcast's U.S. network infrastructure business, told the Journal in November.. The FCC has also worked to ensure that when it comes to fast broadband providers and other high-speed content providers like AT&T and Comcast you can expect to pay a fair price. The cost of data is relatively flat for everyone within the nation's cable and DSL networks; for example, for a $10GB broadband plan that includes high-speed satellite data, average customer connections cost about $50 a month (not including additional data charges such..
