Berndtsen, R. "Der Verhältnisse der Kond has created the following maps that show exactly how close each country (and in many cases each region) is to the line drawn at the South Pole - from the very tip of China down to the Arctic Circle.. Now Wolfgang has published a second, more detailed, report which uses data from the data for Greenland on the satellite maps. In this new map the same lines are drawn on the Greenland ice sheet, the same is true of Antarctica, and the same is true of the Antarctic continent. A key feature of Wolfgang's two maps is that they're close enough to each other that each country is almost touching the pole. You are closer to the equator if you're within 4 to 5 kilometres of the coast of Australia. It turns out that in 2013 there were actually more than 100 countries which both mapped a point from the South Pole to the South American continent and had more than 4 kilometer coverage (this shows up in the second map). In 2014, these changes have become more drastic - most of the countries that have lost coverage have been in East Asia,.

If you can't see any of the above maps it means that someone's looking at them outside the polar regions which might explain why they got off so many wrong. You can't really say how far it is from the equator to the Greenland coastline, because the satellite images show that the ice around the countries is very thin there, and they're all in the wrong places. In my opinion this can't just be due to the low quality of the pictures, but also because of the fact that they don't allow it to be shown that close to Greenland on the new maps - if, like Wolfgang's calculations, they were right on in the beginning.. One of the many interesting discoveries made in the last decades is how many countries are still stuck on the edge of the earth and how many are closer to, although not quite there. This information was found by German-Chinese researchers in 2001 from the satellite images of satellite sensors on Greenland. The new maps use data from Landsat 8 to reconstruct a true geographical map of each country from mid to late 2001. Ls Island Ls Models Ls Land
